

Alexis Feldmeier (Westfälische Wilhelms-Universität, Germanistisches Institut)

Individualized learning in classes for German as Second Language.
An Example of German for the workplace

Literacy Acquisition for Adults needs more than just to write or read. For many adults assisting to literacy classes means to make first experiences in a school like learning situation. Thus learning to write and read (especially in a second language) means learning to learn. In the presentation the importance of learning autonomy for low educated second language and literacy acquisition learners is discussed. An practical example for teaching learning autonomy in the teaching of literacy in German as second language for working purposes is given.